When you register for a free trial for a new beta build of the Google app, you get a number of helpful messages in the status bar when you're using the app. Those messages are quick to glance at, but they provide a great deal of useful information. You can see the number of downloads, the install percentage of the total, whether or not a crash occurred, and much more. The new Messages section of the Status bar quickly provides a quick glance at app performance, but it also adds a new feature: Google sign-in failures. You can see the number of failures and easily find out why you've been logging in incorrectly. You can also see how many users are having trouble signing in or signing up to the Google app. Just tap the section to see more details and get to the bottom of the issue. Android Police has a good breakdown of each messages section in the Google app, so you can explore what else it offers. In the new Messages section, you'll find the following: Signing in / Signing up / Mail Install % Crash Logs Signing out / Signing in Caches / Downloads Updates Available Widgets Apps Feed Gmail Other In the Apps section, the app name is followed by the number of apps that have been installed. In the Activity Log section, the Activity name is followed by the number of installed apps and selected apps. The Activity name followed by the number of installed apps is followed by the percentage of the installed apps that were selected. In the Widgets section, you'll find the widgets installed. There is also a number in the News section in the same location as the number of apps in the Widgets section. This number is followed by a percentage, which tells you the percentage of users who have installed news and selected news. If you have more than one app or widget, you can tap any section to see detailed information. You can download the Google app from the Play Store link below.
