Uber isn't just rolling out Lyft here. On Tuesday, it started a new pilot program called "Pilates for pink" in Boston. It's an effort to make women drivers feel like they're wearing yoga pants and doing cardio as they drive. The idea for the "pilates for pink" program began when the company realized that a lot of women drivers were coming off the Lyft platform when they reached their "pink line" of high volume of daily trips. With Uber, women are given the option to opt out of their pink line if they're not interested. The driving therapy may be a good way to have drivers feel safe and comfortable while on the road. Uber says research shows drivers feel more comfortable around the time they've exercised. The video also gives drivers options of using the mics or the car speakers to exercise while driving. Both Lyft and Uber are both integrating the apps with the fitness tracking app, My Fitness Pal, and through certain partners. Both of the apps have same-day passes available for $50, and the passes include the Uber and Lyft apps for riders. Riders and drivers will be able to earn extra trips for reaching goals with My Fitness Pal. Lyft is also offering free Lyft rides to Fitbit users who link their Fitbit accounts to the app. Uber is rolling out "pilates for pink" to Boston, Denver, Los Angeles and San Francisco next week. The program is currently in the pilot phase, but Uber says it plans to expand it throughout the U.S. Lana Rusek has been in the newsroom at the Boston Herald since March 2016. She is an award-winning reporter with bylines in more than 60 publications, including the New York Times, Washington
