Tag: Hell Howdy, all! In this episode of The Daunting House, we introduce you to the ever-controversial Rupesh. As always, the lore of this game comes from our imaginations, so please, don't take the game or our word for any of this. Rupesh is an archetypal villain who looks exactly like the resident psycho of any of the Creepypastas. He appears at events both horrifying and hilarious, and is often accompanied by a dog. What's new:

of Cards was the first great challenge of Arthur Lee, who was placed in charge of maintaining the many and varied brothels and houses of pleasure in New York City. These houses also included the "whorehouses" that specialize in prostitution; although prostitution had been commonplace in some form or another in New York (city) since the seventeenth century, the term "whorehouse" implies something a little different from your normal "smoker" or "livery stable" or "gentlemen's shelter." Crime historians tend to focus on the "brothel" as a place where women are vulnerable and offended; this need not be the case in a "whorehouse." It is of course true that the "whorehouses" are merely a place where ladies of the town offer their services for rent. However, most frequently, the ladies of these houses are prostitutes rather than "ladies" or "men" as commonly portrayed, and are prone to various disorders including venereal diseases. "Whorehouses" have been around since the 17th Century-17th through 19th Century when most of them were established [Read more...] Lord Quiquepoix was the Governor of a colony called Gann. The colony of Gann sat on the edge of the continent and was the farthest away from the main city of Quiquepoix itself. Lord Quiquepoix could, however, occupy two strange homes: The first, the first, and that was most gracious and fair. The people called it the Delphœnium. The palace was tall, strong and wide; it was built all of marble, and even its furnishings were made of precious and sleek wood. And the floors were made of smooth, white stones, polished so hard even the wind wouldn't knock them over. The Delphœnium was overlooked by a tall, stone cross tower—spacious, strong and beautiful—to the east. The tower itself overlooked the gardens, the many acres of green and magnificent, lush vegetation. The court—before the tower—was a gazebo of stone, perfect for gaming, dancing, music and the like. In the Delphœnium, the floor was made of a green stone called agates, imported and polished from afar by the Lord himself.
