Saudi Arabia, by far the largest exporter of oil, is situated in a region of intense evaporation, and hence a lack of rainfall and its limited (if finite) reserves. Environmentalists have long pressed the matter. The country's ancient deserts are slowly being replaced by the construction of new cities, and each new structure — shopping malls, skyscrapers — consumes more water to maintain its appearance. Human-made stresses are everywhere, but that task has become much more urgent in recent years as population growth outpaces the kingdom's ability to supply water. Toilets are commonplace, and there is a need to grow crops in addition to a requirement to provide shelter for people. As the population nears to tissue collapse. More specifically, there is a need for a device that is readily available and easily operated by a caregiver in a day-to-day situation. Briefly stated, this invention comprises a small collapsible device for relieving airway obstruction that is secured at its closed end to a portion of a patient's mouth, esophagus, trachea, or larynx. The device is preferably of a size to be comfortably worn by
