Analysis of heparan sulfate degrading enzymes from Odontotermes formosanus. Heparan sulfate (HS) degradation in insects is an important process for the degradation of their own tissues, for agglutination during oviposition, and for attachment to biotic and abiotic surfaces. The present study investigated heparan sulfate degrading enzymes from Odontotermes formosanus (OF). A heparan sulfate degrading enzyme from OF was isolated by heparin affinity chromatography and was identified as a serine proteinase. Multiplex PCR was used to analyze the expression of the heparan sulfate degrading enzyme gene of OF. A new heparin-binding motif (SFG(1)X(5)F) was found at the N-terminal regions of both the active and inactive gene products. Four genotypes, SFG(1)X(5)FXXS, SFG(1)X(5)YFXXS, SFG(1)X(5)YFYYS, and SFG(1)X(5)FYFYF, were identified in the coding region of the heparan sulfate degrading enzyme gene from OF. Effect of age on fast-twitch muscle fibre distribution, enzyme activity and myoglobin content in human muscle. The activity and distribution of glycogen synthase, pyruvate kinase and
